Dear future employer

I am writing you today to explain to you why I believe it is important to incorporate important messages about college persistence in our college presentations. College is a time about finding yourself and exploring challenges, and I believe we need to let college students see the importance of that. Many first year generation students and other freshman students start college unaware of the difficult challenges they might face along their journey. They are unaware of the pressures and stress they might feel as they go through college. So when they are presented with these challenges they are quick to give up.

I believe by introducing the benefits and the solutions to overcoming stress, they will be more motivated to finish their experiences. Some of the ways I believe a college student can stay interested in college is to get involved in clubs or organizations. Studies show the students who are more involved in clubs in college are more likely to finish than college dropouts. So by stressing the importance of getting involved early this will decrease the numbers of dropouts.

I also believe that students who seek out a lot of help are students who push through the struggles of college. So if I was to get hired by the university, I could make this very clear to incoming freshmen during orientation week and their parents during open house sessions. Many college students tend to want to be independent, but I could show them that being dependent in college could actually be a key to your success. I would be honored if I was to get hired.

Sincerely

Roshon Jackson
